Summary: This paper presents a new method for the automatic generation of a 3D model of a human body from a set of 2D images. The method is based on a statistical model of the human body shape and pose, which is learned from a large database of 3D scans. The model is then used to generate a 3D model of a specific individual from a set of 2D images. The method is able to handle variations in body shape and pose, and is robust to noise and occlusion. The results show that the method is able to generate a 3D model that is highly similar to the ground truth model.
