1. The first step is to identify the problem. In this case, the problem is that the system is not working properly.

Abstract—The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program on the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women. The study was a randomized, controlled trial. The subjects were 40 sedentary, middle-aged women who were randomly assigned to either a supervised walking program or a control group. The walking program consisted of 12 weeks of supervised walking, 3 times per week, for 30 minutes per session. The control group consisted of 20 women who did not participate in the walking program. The physical and psychological health of the women was assessed at baseline and at 12 weeks. The walking program had a significant positive effect on the physical and psychological health of the women. The walking program significantly improved the women's physical health, as measured by the 6-minute walk test, and their psychological health, as measured by the Beck Depression Inventory and the State-Trait Anxiety Inventory. The walking program also significantly improved the women's quality of life, as measured by the SF-36. The walking program was well tolerated and had no adverse effects. The results of this study suggest that a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program can improve the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women.

Abstract—The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 10-week, 100-hr, nonclinical, laboratory-based, research experience on the self-reported confidence of predoctoral students in their ability to perform research-related tasks. The study was conducted in a laboratory-based research experience program for predoctoral students in the field of psychology. The program was designed to provide students with a research experience that would be equivalent to a 100-hr research experience. The program was evaluated using a pretest-posttest design. The results of the study indicated that the program had a significant positive effect on the self-reported confidence of the students in their ability to perform research-related tasks. The program was found to be effective in increasing the self-reported confidence of the students in their ability to perform research-related tasks. The program was found to be effective in increasing the self-reported confidence of the students in their ability to perform research-related tasks. The program was found to be effective in increasing the self-reported confidence of the students in their ability to perform research-related tasks.
