

During the late 1800s, technology, government policy, and economic conditions significantly changed American agriculture through industrial capitalism, mass-production methods, transportation, and rapid economic development. Prior to the 1865 - 1900. (topic/event/time period/unit in prompt). (identify a few major events that led up to the topic/event/time period/unit in prompt). The explanation of the first event should take at least a few sentences. The explanation of the second event should take at least a few sentences. While (restate the significance of "Prior to" statement). (actors in prompt) + (introduce an argument that relates to the thesis) During 1865 - 1900. Through technological advances, farmers were easily able to mass-produce products; however, this led to an overproduction of the products, which made the market prices of the products drop. The mass productions of goods required them to be transported throughout the country to be sold, which caused the transportation fees to increase. As the agricultural industry was booming and creating great wealth for large companies through subsidies, farmers had to organize together and seek governmental support with the ongoing capitalism.

The 1865 to 1900s use of technological advances was beneficial to farmers, government policy, and economic conditions in 1865 - 1900 mostly had negative changes on American agriculture. During this time, technology was dramatically changing, which affected American agriculture and those associated with it as depicted by the railroads developed from 1870 to 1890. Farmers in the east were running out of soil, so they were forced to continue expanding westward. The further west they went, the more they depended on monopoly railroad companies. It also showed that the development of railways made it easier to transport agricultural products to the east, leading to the overproduction of goods (Doc B). The picture depicts how the application of technology to farming increased the production of crops and supply throughout the country as well as expansion to the west.

Additionally, the statement by the prairie farmer corresponds to the Mann v. Illinois Supreme Court proceedings. The incident limited the fares that large industrial rail companies could charge farmers. Farmers favored this because lower fares allowed them to make more profits on their produce (Doc C). The government gave subsidies to large corporations (capitalists) to allow them to expand their railroads further west, allowing railroad companies to manage the agricultural community of farmers who moved westward. For farmers to sell their crops, it was necessary to transport the goods produced; however, the railway company increased the transportation fees. As a result, the farmers organized together to form organizations such as the Farmers Alliance and the National Grange Movement. Farmers respond to government policies by uniting against the government to support farming communities.
