Name: _____

Date: _____

Embryonic development is a complex series of events that begins with the fertilization of an egg to form a zygote, which eventually gives rise to a full grown organism.

The development of the embryo begins after fertilization. It follows a well-defined pattern of growth and differentiation. Embryonic development is controlled, for the most part, by the genes—the hereditary material contributed by both parents. Development may occur either in the external environment or within the body of a parent.

STAGES OF EMBRYONIC DEVELOPMENT

After fertilization, the zygote divides by mitosis into two cells. Mitotic division, which is called cleavage in embryos, continues, eventually forming a solid ball of cells. This is the morula stage. As cleavage continues, the center of the ball becomes hollow. This is the blastula stage. With still further cleavage, an inward growth of cells at a particular point results in the formation of a pocket, which pushes into the hollow center of the ball. This is the gastrula stage.

Within the double-walled gastrula three distinct layers of embryonic tissue—the germ layers—develop. The inner layer is the endoderm. The outer wall of the gastrula forms the ectoderm. And between the ectoderm and endoderm a middle layer called the mesoderm forms.

1. Label each stage of embryonic development shown in the following diagrams.

2. The three embryonic germ layers are the _____, _____, and _____.
3. Mitotic division in embryonic development is commonly called _____.
