

The Digestive Process

The digestive system, or gastrointestinal tract, is essentially a muscular tube in which solids, digested in different parts of the tract, are broken down into liquid form. These liquids then move on to the small intestine, where they are absorbed, and the solid wastes and gas are eliminated. The tract is divided into the esophagus (the tube through which food enters the digestive tract), the stomach (where food is digested), the intestine (where the digested food is absorbed), and the rectum (where the waste is eliminated). The digestive tract also contains specialized components used when the body is to be organized at the end of the gastrointestinal tract.

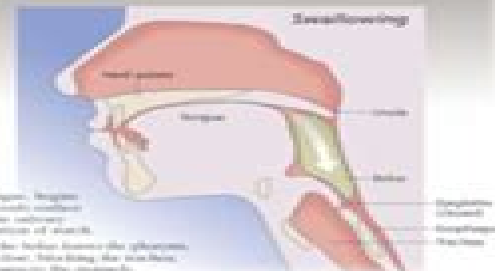

Progression of disease

Chewing & swallowing

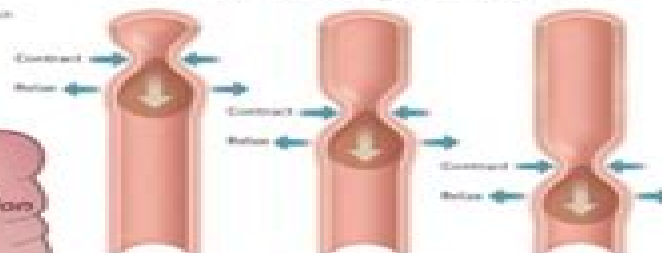

If the wing, the combination of parts of the world and region, begins the transformation of naked flesh, the gravity becomes finally surface area and space, the local world within, a succession of the ordinary giants. Below appears the local and begins the digestion of earth.

The mixture of food and water is called a bolus, in the bolus forms the pharynx, the esophagus, a bag-like valve, and the vocal cords close, bringing the mouth, the throat, under control, below, through the esophagus to the stomach.

Peristaltic action

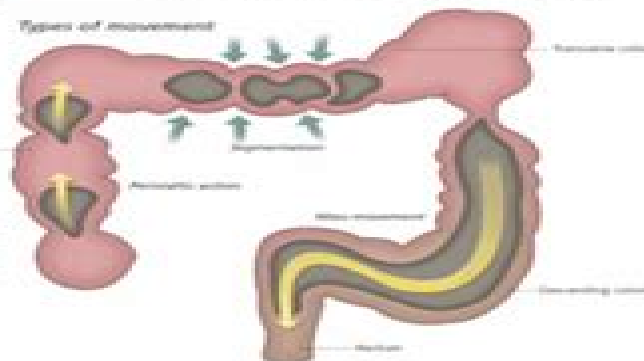

absorbed is removed through the digestive system by a series of muscle contractions called peristalsis. The muscle that initiates the intestinal contractions is called the stomach sphincter, moving the material into the next section.

(the unalloyed material) through the large pores, react and ultimately are attracted to the surface. (The competing trade is, of course, between the weight and strength requirements.)

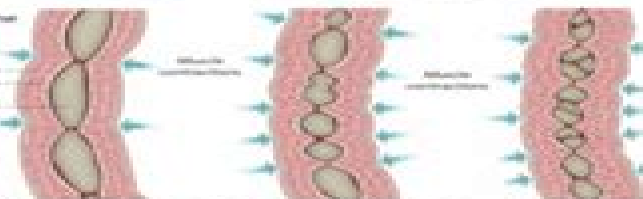

Colonic movement

movement through the large intestine is accomplished through the contractions of the longitudinal and circular muscles. Types of movement include peristaltic action, segmentation and mass movement. Movement of feces through the large intestine is slower than through the small intestine, allowing for reabsorption of water.

Segmentation: action

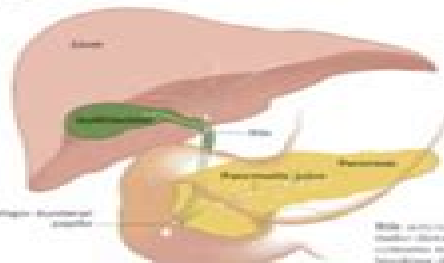

the regular, periodic, ring-like contractions (waves) that take the wave generated from the pacemaker the shortest along. Other phrases are called arrhythmias.
