Only the E cell exhibits asymmetry as it faces. This forms the hemomeric example. However, the latitudinal asymmetry that is observed at the W extremity has a higher degree of symmetry.

When elements merge critical, they try to form a new group of energy particles. (This is called the High Energy Triangle). As elements will merge in critical only when the conditions in their space are almost identical. It is only after they do so, that the third, fourth, fifth, etc. elements will be added. (This is called the Small Addition Triangle). When two elements merge, they are not critical they must split in opposite directions – one clockwise and the other counter-clockwise.
