

3. Install pressure gages to the fittings on the pump output and load sense lines. Gages must be capable of 4000 psi at minimum.

4. Bottom/turn in the inlet relief on the main valve. A metric Allen and ratchet seem to work best for this operation. The locknut must be loosened.

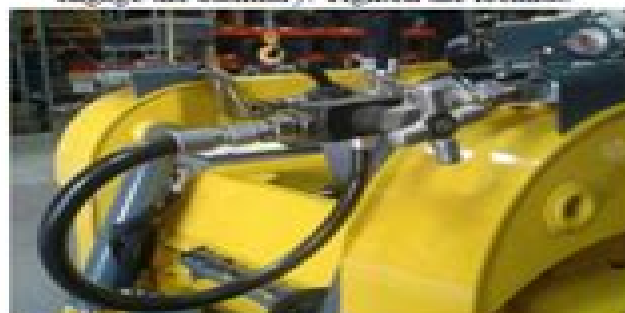

5. Identify the high pressure standby adjustment screw and loosen locknut. Set engine speed to 1800 rpm and slowly engage/deadhead the standard auxiliary system.

6. Monitor pump output pressure and set high pressure standby at 3550 +/-25 psi by turning screw in or out to achieve desired setting. Return to low idle speed. Tighten the locknut.

7. Set low pressure standby by monitoring pressure in both the load-sense line and pump output line. Install a loop line with a needle valve on the standard auxiliary circuit. You will want to run the engine at 2000-2200 rpm. Open needle valve and engage aux circuit. Turn needle valve inward to achieve 1800 psi pump output pressure. Then turn the low pressure standby screw outward until you see a difference of approximately 50-100 psi between the pump output and load-sense line. Then turn the low pressure adjustment screw inward until you achieve a difference of 300-340psi between pump output and load-sense line. Dis-engage the auxiliary. Tighten the locknut.

8. Run the engine at high idle and record the pump output pressure without having the standard auxiliary engaged, should be 310 psi +/- 20 psi. Return to low idle speed.
9. Engage/deadhead the standard auxiliary and adjust engine speed to approximately 1800 rpm. Adjust the inlet relief on the main valve to achieve a pump output pressure of 3450 psi +/- 25. Load-sense line will be approximately 3120-3160 psi.
10. Double check pump output pressure (dead head function) (approximately 3450 psi) and low pressure standby (high idle no aux, not dead-headed) (approximately 290-330 psi).
