

Structure and architecture

7.1 Introduction

Two related but distinct issues are discussed in this chapter. These are the relationship between structure and architecture and the relationship between structural engineers and architects. Each of these may take more than one form, and the type which is in play at any time influences the effect which structure has on architecture. These are issues which shed an interesting sidelight on the history of architecture.

Structure and architecture may be related in a wide variety of ways ranging between the extremes of complete domination of the architecture by the structure to total disregard of structural requirements in the determination of both the form of a building and of its aesthetic treatment. This infinite number of possibilities is discussed here under six broad headings:

- ornamentation of structure
- structure as ornament
- structure as architecture
- structure as form generator
- structure accepted
- structure ignored

This may range from, at one extreme, a situation in which the form of a building is determined solely by the architect with the engineer being concerned only with making it stand up, to, at the other extreme, the engineer acting as architect and determining the form of the building and all other architectural aspects of the design. Mid-way between these extremes is the situation in which architect and engineer collaborate fully over the form of a building and evolve the design jointly. As will be seen, the type of relationship which is adopted has a significant effect on the nature of the resulting architecture.

7.2 The types of relationship between structure and architecture

7.2.1 Ornamentation of structure

In the periods in which this mood has prevailed, the forms that have been adopted have been logical consequences of the structural armatures of buildings. The category ornamentation of structure, in which the building consists of little more than a visible structural armature adjusted in fairly minor ways for visual reasons, has been one version of this.

Perhaps the most celebrated building in the Western architectural tradition in which structure dictated form was the Parthenon in Athens (Fig. 7.1). The architecture of the Parthenon is tectonic: structural requirements dictated the form and, although the purpose of the building was not to celebrate structural technology, its formal logic was celebrated as part of the visual expression. The Doric Order, which reached its greatest degree of
