

One Thousand Paper Cranes for Peace: The Story of Sadako Sasaki

On August 6th, 1945, World War II's Allied forces dropped an atomic bomb on the Japanese city of Hiroshima. In an instant, the city was destroyed. . On that tragic day, 140,000 people were killed.

The Sasaki family lived one mile from the spot where the bomb went off. The couple and their two-year-old daughter, Sadako, managed to survive the nuclear attack, though soon after the explosion, thick black clouds of radioactive soot and dust began to fall like snow. The family tried to protect themselves. However, they breathed the contaminated air.

As time went on, the Sasakis had three more children, though Sadako was always her mother's favorite: "She was so considerate and thoughtful and always helped in the house," she wrote. As Sadako grew older, she became a strong, healthy, athletic young woman – she was the fastest runner on her school track team.

But when Sadako was twelve years old, she started feeling ill. A doctor's visit confirmed her parents' greatest fears: Sadako had been contaminated with radiation poisoning from the atomic bomb and she was dying.
