Introduction

Light is a part of a continuous spectrum, or energy waves. Shorter wavelengths of energy have greater amounts of energy. For example, high energy ultraviolet rays, with wavelengths of approximately 1 nanometer (nm) to 400 nm, can burn living tissues that no other light sources can. Shorter energy (red) wavelengths of light make the visible part of the light spectrum (400 nm to 700 nm) and are visible to the human eye. Long visible light, with the longest wavelength, has enough energy to cause chemical changes without damaging biological molecules. The short, high frequency waves of gamma rays (100 nm) have the most energy and break the hydrogen bonds that hold together biological molecules such as amino acid and nucleic acids (DNA). The longer waves of radio electromagnetic wavelengths (100 nm to 10¹⁰ meters) do not provide enough energy and are absorbed by other matter molecules in a plant.

When light is absorbed by leaf pigments such as chlorophyll a or b, absorbed visible light (photosynthetically active radiation or photosynthetically active energy) is used to produce ATP, the molecule ADP to ATP and a chemical or nonchemical carbon dioxide (CO₂) into sugar molecules in a process called carbon fixation (see photo below, normally).

When that rate appears and continues with a reaction that creates energy and the leaf disk increases size (see photo below). This leaf disk increases thickness as small amounts of sodium bicarbonate (NaHCO₃) float, enabling the bicarbonate ions to enter an other carbon source for photosynthesis. As photosynthesis proceeds, oxygen is released further water for the leaf which changes thickness, making the disk float. When a bubble accumulates in the epidermis of the upper leaf surface (the leaf, containing the largest percentage generated by photosynthesis, the lower leaf surface area is an indirect measurement of the rate of photosynthesis. In this lab, you will measure the rate of photosynthesis for several aquatic under water light conditions.
