

Art history: a guide to basic research resources

Ching-Fung Chen

City College of New York, New York, NY, USA

Abstract

Purpose – The purpose of this paper is to present basic resources and practical strategies for undergraduate art history research.

Design/methodology/approach – The paper is based on the author's experience as both an art librarian and instructor for a core requirement art history course.

Findings – The plan detailed in this paper covers every step of the research process, from exploring the topic to citing the sources. The resources listed, which include subscription databases as well as public web sites, are deliberately limited to a manageable number. Additional topics include defining the scope of inquiry and making appropriate use of internet resources such as Wikipedia.

Originality/value – The paper provides the academic librarian with clear guidance on basic research resources in art history.

Keywords Arts, History, Undergraduates, Research, Resources, Academic libraries

Paper type General review

As a branch of the liberal arts education, art history courses are widely offered as part of the core curriculum for undergraduate studies. Yet many of the students writing art history papers are not art majors and are unfamiliar with resources in art history. Even for art majors, research is often conducted in a haphazard manner, the outcome depending as much on luck as on skills. This paper presents a practical and methodical guide to undergraduate art history research. The strategies detailed here are based on discussions with art history professors and students as well as my experience as an art librarian and instructor of an art history survey course[1].

Despite the profusion of online subject guides, none offers a step-by-step guide to basic research about art or provides undergraduates with effective research strategies. The numerous guides to art history with links to hundreds of resources maintained by research universities and leading museums are generally not suitable for students in survey courses, who are often overwhelmed by the complexity and richness of materials in those comprehensive guides[2]. Furthermore, many of the most popular sites listed in online subject guides, such as the amazing Art History Resources on the Web created by Christopher Witcombe (2009), are not useful for students who are simply looking for a few books and journal articles to write an undergraduate museum paper.

Bibliographic instruction offered by academic librarians provides a road map to the resources in the library. The typical library instruction, organized by the type of reference tools and focusing on subscription databases, does not adequately prepare students to undertake research independently. Many students remain vague about the most effective sequence of steps to take. In their bibliographies, they often list whatever turns up first in their searches. In addition, they are easily stumped by obscure topics which demand more than a few obvious searches in the obvious databases.

The strategies detailed in this paper cover every step of the research process, from exploring the topic to citing the sources. The resources listed, which include subscription databases as well as public web sites, are deliberately limited to a manageable number. Additional topics include defining the scope of inquiry, conveying the correct attitude towards research, and making appropriate use of internet resources such as Wikipedia.

The first, and most important, part of the research process concerns exploring the topic, defining the scope of inquiry, and compiling a list of search terms. This preparatory step, one that is often missed in library instruction, must take place before searching for books and journal articles. In other words, students need to learn enough about the topic of the assignment to lay the groundwork for further research. The best starting points for this task are the web site of the Metropolitan Museum of Art (n.d.) in New York and Oxford Art Online.

The Heilbrunn Timeline of Art History, part of the vast resources available to the public on the web site of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, is a chronological, geographical, and thematic exploration of art history from around the world as illustrated by the collection of the Museum (www.metmuseum.org/toah). Written by the Museum's curatorial, conservation, and education staff, the Timeline provides reliable, scholarly information in an accessible language. It is beautifully designed, illustrated with full-size images, and easy to navigate. An excellent introduction to cultural and historical backgrounds from prehistory to the present, it is a very useful guide for today's students, whose knowledge of world history and geography is often uncertain. Students should be reminded, however, to explore the Timeline from all the entry points (Works of Art, Timelines and Maps, Exploring Particular Themes, Indexes and Search) because they might not know enough about their topics to look in the right periods or themes.
