CSA 100-74-C-0033
USAF DRAWING NO. 66D1596

The SRU-21/P Survival Vest was introduced into the Air Force during the Vietnam war for use by all their aircrews. The U. S. Army also used the vest for its helicopter crews and it proved beneficial to special ground forces as well. The Air Force and Army are still using the SRU-21/P today and the Navy even uses a modified version for its search and rescue aircrews designed the CMU-24/P. The Army, however, will be replacing the vest with a new design called the SARVIP that incorporates body armor and an extraction harness.

This nylon cloth mesh, sage green vest comes in medium and large sizes with a string adjustment in back and incorporates twelve pockets (10 outside, 2 inside) for a variety of survival items. These pockets can be relocated and modified to suit the mission or the wearer. There is also an Aramid mesh fabric fire resistant vest available. The pockets use Velcro for closures but very early designs had snap pockets. A leather holster with two securing straps is normally sewn onto the left side to accommodate a .38 caliber revolver. Earlier designed holsters had only one strap. The nylon OV-1 vest holster is also being used in lieu of the leather holster. The extra ammo resides in one of the smaller pockets. The standard five inch pilots knife with leather sheath and sharpening stone is sometimes added to the vest if not carried on the individual. Both items can be sewn in a particular position to suit the airman. All components are secured to the vest by a specific length of type III nylon cord or size III cotton cord.

The vest can be worn over body armor and an underarm life preserver, type LPU-2/P or LPU-10/P. An LPU-3/P is also used but integrates into a parachute torso harness which attaches to the harness with zippers. The newest life preserver, the LPU-9/P, is worn around the neck and chest and attaches to the parachute torso harness.
