Supermarkets accused of sugar sales push while claiming to tackle obesity

Denis Campbell
Health policy editor

UK supermarkets have been accused of encouraging people to consume more sugar, despite the huge concern about its role in causing obesity, rotten teeth and type 2 diabetes.

Food campaigners claim supermarkets are doing little to reduce the amount of sugar they sell across their product ranges and are misleading people about how much they are doing to tackle obesity.

for increasing the amount of sugar people consume while pretending to be committed to helping shoppers adopt healthier diets.

The top 10 retailers account for 95% of all food sold in Britain. In the report the campaigners said: "The major companies, which guide daily purchasing decisions, supermarkets, continue to encourage sugar consumption through their drive for higher sales, despite paying lip service to healthy eating goals."

Asked whether they had set a target to reduce the total amount of sugar they sell across their range of sales of healthier products, such as breakfast cereals and yogurts containing less sugar.

But, the report adds: "Promoting sugar reduction success without reducing sugar sales misleads the public and government to think retail

None of the 10 chains provided evidence that they had successfully cut the total amount of sugar they sell. Iceland and Asda did not respond to a survey the two groups undertook.

The amount of sugar imported, bought and used in Britain is still rising. This is despite successive governments and health experts warning for years about the damage sugar causes. Britain imports 2.2m tonnes of sugar a year. By head of population, that amounts to three times the safe limit of consumption.

The final report of the government's sugar reduction programme, published in December, found the average amount in products such as
