

Unit 11: Causes and Spread of Infection

Notes:

Summary:

1.1. Identifying the structure of infectious diseases, viruses, bacteria, fungi, and parasites
Viruses Viruses are single-celled microorganisms, depending on host cells and tissues to grow and survive. They are produced and assembled within specific host cells through budding. Although some bacteria, like bacilli, make up most cases of viral diseases, they are not viruses and are not produced by a single infectious molecule.
Bacteria Bacteria are tiny organisms, some that are visible with a light microscope and others up to a point, visible and surrounded by a protective coat called capsule. Unlike viruses, bacteria only need to cause one infection.
Fungi Fungi are single-celled organisms that can grow and reproduce. They are produced by means of spores, which develop into and are released by a single infectious molecule.
Parasites Parasites are single-celled organisms that depend on host cells and tissues to grow and reproduce. They are produced by means of spores, which develop into and are released by a single infectious molecule. Unlike bacteria, parasites only need to cause one infection.
1.2. Identifying common infectious diseases and organisms that cause them, viruses, bacteria, fungi and parasites
Viruses Cytomegalovirus, Epstein-Barr virus, Herpesvirus, HIV, Influenza, Measles, Mumps, Rubella, Tetanus, Tuberculosis, Varicella-Zoster virus.
Bacteria Bacteria and viruses, like Bacteria, Streptococcus, Staphylococcus, Salmonella, Shigella, and the Clostridia, Pseudomonas.
Fungi Fungi are single-celled organisms, produced by means of spores, which develop into and are released by a single infectious molecule. Unlike bacteria, fungi only need to cause one infection.
Parasites Parasites are single-celled organisms that depend on host cells and tissues to grow and reproduce. They are produced by means of spores, which develop into and are released by a single infectious molecule.
