

SIMPLE, PORTABLE GROUNDPLANE ANTENNA

This utility antenna is built on a coaxial connector. UHF connectors work well, but you may prefer to use type N or BNC connectors. With only two radials, it is essentially two dimensional, which makes it easier to store when not in use.

If the antenna is sheltered from weather, copper wire is sufficiently rigid for the radiating element and radials. Antennas exposed to the wind and weather can be made from brazing rod, which is available at welding supply stores. Alternatively, #12 or #14 copper-clad steel wire could be used to construct this antenna.

The ground-plane antenna is shown in Fig 22.96 and uses a female chassis-mount Fig 22.96 — A simple groundplane antenna for the 144, 222 or 440-MHz bands. The feed line and connector are inside the mast, and a hose clamp squeezes the slotted mast end to tightly grip the plug body. Element and radial dimensions given in the drawing are good for the entire band.

connector to support the element and two radials. To eliminate sharp ends, it's a good idea to bend the element and radial ends into a circle or to terminate them with a solder lug. See Fig 22.97. The solder lug approach is easier with stiff wire. Crimp and then solder the lug to the wire. Make the overall length of the element and radials the same as shown in Fig 22.96, measuring to the outer tip of the loop or lug.

Radials may be attached directly to the mounting holes of the coaxial connector. Bend a hook at one end of each radial for insertion through the connector. Solder the radials to the connector using a large soldering iron or propane torch.

Solder the element to the center pin of the connector. If the element does not fit inside the solder cup, use a short section of brass tubing as a coupler (a slotted 1/8-inch-ID tube will fit over an SO-239 or N-receptacle center pin).

Tune the antenna by adjusting the radial droop angle for best SWR. If necessary, you can also prune the element length.

One mounting method for fixed-station antennas appears in Fig 22.96. The feed line and connector are inside the mast, and a hose clamp squeezes the slotted mast end to tightly grip the plug body. Once the antenna is mounted and tested, thoroughly seal the open side of the coaxial connector with RTV sealant, and weatherproof the connections with rust-preventative paint.
