

Hosting your own small informal event is a great way to meet new people as well as be helpful to the people you already know.

Don't try to impress someone with your title or expertise. Instead, enter into conversations, ask questions, and listen. The things you might have in common help to establish a connection that will blossom over time.

Your business card is only as powerful as the impression you leave behind. So get to know the person first, gauge if there's a connection, and then end the conversation by offering your card.

Don't ask about job opportunities and favors without offering any value in return. Networking is a two-way street.

You should strive to be memorable when you're meeting new people, and the best way to do so is through good storytelling. When you tell a story, you're also telling a fact and a punch line, whether a takeaway or a joke.

You want people to like you and connect with you because you're being genuine. Develop a curiosity for others and be open to new relationships where you can learn something new about yourself in the way. Let people know the impact they've had on you.

Even if you're shy or introverted, you just have to engage with people. Try to emulate someone you admire in these situations until it becomes more natural to do so. After everyone was a stranger to you before you met them.

Don't just create a network at your level or industry—diversify! Be intentional about bringing in those above and below you and from a variety of industries. You'll create a whole new network of his or her contacts to you.

The more you invest in your network, the more valuable your network is. Taking calls, responding to emails, offering to help people creates a strong network. And a strong network is a place where you have these relationships when you need help.

The last moments of a conversation can define how people will remember you, so make a good solid ending without being rude or abrupt. Hold eye contact for a very brief moment with the person you have finished speaking with so it doesn't seem like you're running away.
