

Abstract: The authors have used a simple, reproducible model system to study the effects of various factors on the rate of protein synthesis in a cell-free system. The results show that the rate of protein synthesis is affected by the concentration of the substrate, the concentration of the enzyme, and the concentration of the cofactors. The results also show that the rate of protein synthesis is affected by the temperature and the pH of the reaction mixture. The results suggest that the rate of protein synthesis is a complex process that is regulated by many factors.

The fast neutron-fission experiments were carried out by the French Atomic Energy Commission, which was highly involved in such activities, mainly due to competition with other countries in nuclear energy.
