

Advanced accounting chapter 3: consolidations subsequent to the date of acquisition

- The basic objective of all consolidations (regardless of passage of time) remains the same: to combine asset, liability, revenue, expense, and equity accounts of a parent and its subsidiaries
- Consolidated net income must be determined through worksheets, the subsidiary's expenses must be changed from their book values to the acquisition date values for the parent, adjustments for amortization must be made, and the effects of any intra-entity transactions are removed
- Choices for the parent company to monitor the activities of its subsidiaries: the equity method, initial value method, and the partial equity method.
- All three of the *above methods start with an identical value recorded in an investment account at the acquisition date
- After the acquisition date, the three methods produce different amounts on the parent company's accounting records involving: investment in subsidiary, income recognized from the subsidiary's activities, and retained earnings
- Equity method (single-line consolidation, accrual basis): parent company accrues its share of subsidiary income in the same period that it is earned, amortization expense stemming from the acquisition date excess fair value allocations is recognized through periodic adjusting entries, unrealized gross profits on intra-entity transactions are deferred, and subsidiary dividends serve to reduce the investment account balance.
- Initial value method (cash basis): investment balance remains on the parent's financial records at the initial fair value assigned at the acquisition date, does NOT recognize income as its earned by the subsidiary, recognizes dividend income from its share of dividends when declared
- Partial equity method: parent company accrues its share of subsidiary income in the same period the subsidiary earns it, dividends reduce the investment balance, NO other equity adjustments (no amortization, deferrals) are recorded.
- The method the acquiring company adopts affects ONLY its separate financial records, and has no impact on the subsidiary's balances.
- under the equity method, the parent company must amortize each allocation over its expected life

Equity Method Journal Entries:

To record the acquisition: debit investment in __ company, credit cash

To record cash dividend from subsidiary: debit dividend receivable, credit investment in...

To record receipt of subsidiary cash dividend: debit cash, credit dividend receivable
