Clinical Aspects of Albumin S.H. Yap, C.L.H. Majoor, J.H.M. van Tongeren, 2012-12-06 Albumin is the most abundant serum protein produced by the liver In clinical practice the serum level of albumin continues to be used as an important marker of the presence progress or of the improvement of many diseases even though it is the complex end result of synthesis degradation and distribution between intra and extravascular space The clinical history of albumin began as early as in 1837 when Ansell first recognized albumen and noted that this protein is needed for transport functions for maintaining fluidity of the vascular system and for the prevention of edema However the important physiological properties of serum proteins and their role in the regulation of the oncotic pressure were demonstrated later by the physiologist E H Starling in 1895 In 1917 the clinician A A Epstein first described the edema in patients with the nephrotic syndrome as being a result of a very low level of serum albumin Although the determination of serum albumin concentration became more popular after Howe in 1921 introduced the technique of separation of serum globulins from albumin by sodium sulfate the first preparations of human serum albumin were made available for clinical use in only 1941 by the development of plasma fractionation by Cohn and his coworkers at Harvard Medical School
