1. Define GDP and distinguish between a final good and an intermediate good. Provide examples.
GDP is the market value of all the final goods and services produced within a country in a given time period. A final good or service is an item that is sold to the final user, that is, the final consumer, government, a firm making investment, or a foreign entity. An intermediate good or service is an item that is produced by one firm, bought by another firm, and used as a component of a final good or service. For instance, bread sold to a consumer is a final good, but wheat sold to a baker to make the bread is an intermediate good. Distinguishing between final goods and services and intermediate goods and services is important because only final goods and services are directly included in GDP; intermediate goods must be excluded to avoid double counting them. For example, counting the wheat that went into the bread as well as the bread would double count the wheat—once as wheat and once as part of the bread.
2. Why does GDP equal aggregate income and also equal aggregate expenditure?
GDP equals aggregate income because one way to value production is by the cost of the factors of production employed. The cost of the factors of production employed—wages, interest, rent, and profit—equal aggregate income and therefore aggregate income equals GDP. GDP equals aggregate expenditure because another way to value production is by the price that buyers pay for the production in the market. Aggregate expenditure equals the sum of consumption expenditure, investment, government expenditure, and exports minus imports, which is the total amount spent buying the production in the market. Therefore GDP equals aggregate expenditure.
3. What are the distinctions between domestic and national, and gross and net?
“Domestic” means that the production being measured is within a country no matter by whom; “national” means that the production is produced by residents of the nation anywhere within the world. “Gross” means before subtracting depreciation. “Net” means after subtracting depreciation. The terms apply to investment, business profit, and aggregate production.
