

Study 1

Observations suggest that individuals report a homogeneous belief about whether the world is generalizable after controlling for their attitudes. The question is: if individuals are not rational, does the homogeneity of their beliefs reflect a common bias or a common cognitive process?

Study 2

In this study, we used a new method to estimate that the degree to which people believe in generalizability is related to their beliefs about the world and the ability to generalize. The new method is based on the fact that the more people believe in generalizability, the more likely they are to believe in generalizability. The new method is based on the fact that the more people believe in generalizability, the more likely they are to believe in generalizability. The new method is based on the fact that the more people believe in generalizability, the more likely they are to believe in generalizability.
