Recombination during meiosis

Recombination is the exchange of DNA segments between non-sister chromatids of homologous chromosomes. This process occurs during Prophase I of Meiosis I, where the chromosomes are tightly coiled and the non-sister chromatids of homologous chromosomes are closely associated. The exchange of DNA segments between non-sister chromatids results in the formation of new genetic combinations, which are passed on to the gametes. This process is illustrated in Figure 3, where the non-sister chromatids of the Aa pair exchange segments during Prophase I.
