Abstract

Abstract—The purpose of this study was to determine if there were differences in the prevalence of musculoskeletal disorders among different types of workers. The study included 600 male employees from three different occupations: construction, manufacturing, and service. Data were collected through self-administered questionnaires. Results showed that the prevalence of musculoskeletal disorders was highest among construction workers, followed by manufacturing workers, and lowest among service workers. These findings suggest that certain occupational factors may contribute to the development of musculoskeletal disorders.
