

Animal Husbandry

Overview of farm animal husbandry

Domestic livestock is a term which covers animals traditionally used in farming to produce food and fibre or labour. Farming pursuits can be carried out either for commercial purposes or by individuals aiming to be as self-sufficient as possible. Traditionally domestic livestock covered a range of animals including sheep, cattle, horses, pigs, poultry and bees, whereas today more exotic animals such as alpacas, fallow deer, camels, ostriches and fish are also farmed.

An animal is considered domesticated when their breeding and living conditions are controlled by people. The result of domesticating animals, or raising livestock for human benefit, is that we then become responsible for the animals welfare.

General animal welfare covers:

- Food and water
- Shelter
- Health and wellbeing
- Handling and injury
- Companionship
- Reproduction

The following points are general; this course does not have the capacity to cover all points of care necessary for all animals which may be farmed.

Nutrition

The Department of Primary Industries, Parks, Water and Environment (DPIPWE) states that the most common problem for small landholders running cattle on their holding is poor nutrition, usually caused by overstocking. The landholder may see lots of grass in the height of spring or because the property has perhaps been de-stocked for a period of time, and it is easy to overestimate the carrying capacity of the holding. Carrying capacity – often talked about in dry sheep equivalent (DSE), is a tool to help work out the correct number of animals for a given area. One DSE is rated at the amount of feed (kg of dry matter) required for an adult 45 – 50 kg wether or non-lactating ewe to maintain its weight. It is used as a standard to compare between different classes of livestock and to determine stocking rates and carrying capacity of a property. To calculate your average stocking rate (DSE/ha), divide the average liveweight per hectare by 50.
