Do Investment Regulations Compromise Pension Fund Performance? Pulle Subrahmanya Srinivas, Juan Yermo, 1999-01-01

Draconian regulations have created distortions in asset management limited opportunities for diversification and as a consequence have hampered the performance of pension funds This volume shows that the return to retirement assets expected replacement rates and hence the net welfare gain from pension reform is lower under a draconian regulatory framework than under a more liberal pension fund investment regime Important policy conclusions of the paper are that existing regulatory regimes should be liberalized as soon as possible to allow pension fund investments in a wider array of financial instruments and that regulations should require evaluation of pension fund performance against market benchmarks as opposed to exclusive focus on comparisons with industry averages The paper also suggests a review of the current structure of the private pension fund industry in Latin America and an evaluation against alternatives in the light of actual performance experience
