This was a watershed for the international community. It established for the first time a permanent institution where the interests of the world's 140 developing countries could be represented. The United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) was established in 1964. It was the first time that developing countries had a permanent voice in the United Nations. The conference was held in Geneva, Switzerland, and it was the first time that developing countries had a permanent voice in the United Nations. The conference was held in Geneva, Switzerland, and it was the first time that developing countries had a permanent voice in the United Nations. These authors have suggested that, in addition to the existing open to closed dichotomy in the literature, there are conceptual issues in operationalising the idea of participation. These arise from differences both theoretically (from engagement, involvement, consultation) and within each of the latter ideas in terms of power, the involvement of target populations, and engagement methods. In addition, they state that the need to make the idea of participation more robust, thereby any conceptualised construct operationalised for analysis is greater than for consultation/engagement or involvement.

The above three activities are interconnected and mutually supportive in order to strategize the future.
