Abstract—This study focused on the effects of a 12-week group exercise program on the self-reported health status of older adults. The study was conducted in a community center in a large city in the United States. The study included 100 participants, all of whom were aged 65 and older. The study was designed to evaluate the effects of a 12-week group exercise program on the self-reported health status of older adults. The study included a pre-test and a post-test. The pre-test was conducted at the beginning of the study, and the post-test was conducted at the end of the 12-week program. The study included a control group and an experimental group. The control group consisted of 50 participants who did not participate in the exercise program. The experimental group consisted of 50 participants who participated in the exercise program. The study included a series of questionnaires that were administered at the pre-test and post-test. The questionnaires included questions about the participants' self-reported health status, their level of physical activity, and their level of social support. The study found that the experimental group had significantly higher self-reported health status scores than the control group at the post-test. The study also found that the experimental group had significantly higher levels of physical activity and social support than the control group at the post-test. The study concluded that a 12-week group exercise program can improve the self-reported health status of older adults.
