by Lauren Lippman

The A350-900 is ready to take flight. The assembly of the first Airbus A350-900, an ultra-long, widebody, twin-engine jet, is underway. The fuselage and wing components will flow from their manufacturing plants, and then to final assembly in Toulouse, France, and finally to test sites.

The center fuselage, identified section 17, is the longest of the three, at 25.5 meters. Section 17 is built up from its discrete composite panels made by Spirit AeroSystems facilities in Kinston, N.C., and Spirit AeroSystems Plant, and the front fuselage will come from the Airbus plant in Hamburg, Germany. For each aircraft produced, the two final assembly lines in Kinston will build the three sections of the fuselage already equipped with wing fairings, tailcones and cabin systems, such as air conditioning. The plant's wings will be assembled by Spirit in Houston, Tex., and shipped to Kinston, N.C., just west of it, to be joined to the fuselage. Spirit AeroSystems is also building the front wing spar and main cabin floor for the A350-900. The plant is also building the front wing spar and main cabin floor for the A350-900. brakes, air systems, 50,000-hertz electric, but it will accommodate new systems in the future. The ability to adapt to the changing production needs of its customers allows Airbus to focus its spirit. The 17th section is built up from its discrete composite panels made by Spirit AeroSystems facilities in Kinston, N.C., and Spirit AeroSystems Plant, and the front fuselage will come from the Airbus plant in Hamburg, Germany.

Intelligent design: Fuselage

A major development of the A350 design is that the new fuselage incorporates smart airframe. The use of long, tapered sections allows more space for equipment and systems, and weight optimization. The design is so simple to build that it can be built in a single piece, which is a major benefit for the A350-900. Because the fuselage section is not curved, it can be built in a single piece, which is a major benefit for the A350-900. The design is so simple to build that it can be built in a single piece, which is a major benefit for the A350-900.
