11. Theoretically, the demand curve for a factor is downward-sloping, implying that the firm's demand for that factor will be greater when the price of that factor is lower. In the short run, the firm's demand for a factor is downward-sloping because the firm's demand for that factor is derived from the firm's demand for the final product. In the long run, the firm's demand for a factor is downward-sloping because the firm's demand for that factor is derived from the firm's demand for the final product.
