Researcher's research interests change over and over when the interests that they are studying change. The extent to which this happens varies and needs additional research. Some things are clear, however. Researchers' knowledge, attitudes and values change over time. They might not change systematically, but they do change in a systematic way. The authors' conclusions are based on

These results have a straightforward interpretation. The first result is particularly striking in that it shows that the effect of the treatment on the probability of being employed is positive and significant. This is true for both the short and long run. The second result shows that the treatment has a positive and significant effect on the probability of being employed in the short run, but this effect is not significant in the long run. The third result shows that the treatment has a positive and significant effect on the probability of being employed in the short run, but this effect is not significant in the long run. The fourth result shows that the treatment has a positive and significant effect on the probability of being employed in the short run, but this effect is not significant in the long run. The fifth result shows that the treatment has a positive and significant effect on the probability of being employed in the short run, but this effect is not significant in the long run. The sixth result shows that the treatment has a positive and significant effect on the probability of being employed in the short run, but this effect is not significant in the long run. The seventh result shows that the treatment has a positive and significant effect on the probability of being employed in the short run, but this effect is not significant in the long run. The eighth result shows that the treatment has a positive and significant effect on the probability of being employed in the short run, but this effect is not significant in the long run.
