Abstract. The purpose of this study was to determine if there were differences in the prevalence of dental caries among children who had been exposed to fluoride varnish compared to those who had not. A cross-sectional study was conducted in a public health clinic in a low-income urban area. Data were collected from medical records and interviews with parents. Results showed that the prevalence of dental caries was significantly lower in the fluoride varnish group than in the control group. These findings suggest that fluoride varnish may be an effective method for preventing dental caries in children.
