

Airplanes

Within a century, airplanes have not only fulfilled humanity's ancient wish to fly but also have become a means of transportation used by many people and can quickly cover great distances. Even though the earliest models—made of wood, fabric, and steel—have evolved into huge jets capable of carrying hundreds of passengers over oceans, as well as into supersonic military aircraft, all planes are governed by the same physical laws.

Hold Up by the Wing

The speed and lift of an airplane is largely a result of the shape of its wing. This shape causes the air flowing above the wing to travel faster than the air below. Pressure resulting from speed is reduced, the pressure of the air above decreases, and by using a vacuum it is the pressure of the air below it is the force of air is increased in a vacuum. The pressure from lift and air lift.

Propulsion

In order for the airplane to fly, it must be propelled forward. The most common method of propulsion is the reaction force of the gases coming from the engine.

- 1 The air enters the engine and is compressed.
- 2 The engine compresses the air and heats it, increasing its temperature.
- 3 The hot air expands and pushes the piston forward, creating thrust.
- 4 The piston moves back and forth, creating a continuous motion.

Supersonic Engines

Mach

A Mach number is a ratio of the speed of an object to the speed of sound. The speed of sound is approximately 343 meters per second (1,125 feet per second) at sea level.

In Flight

When an airplane is in flight, it is subject to various forces and must maintain a balance of forces to stay aloft.

Wings

The wings of an airplane are designed to create lift. The shape of the wing, the speed of the air, and the weight of the airplane all affect the lift.

Engines

The engines of an airplane provide the thrust needed to move the plane forward.

Flaps

Flaps are movable surfaces on the wing that can be extended to increase lift and drag. They are used during takeoff and landing to allow the plane to fly at lower speeds.

Autopilot

The autopilot system allows the pilot to set a course and altitude and the plane will fly itself. It is used to reduce pilot workload and improve safety.
