Conclusion: While these attachments may represent an interesting period in their lives, most of the participants showed a clear tendency to discontinue the use of the attachment and, therefore, did not report a significant impact on their career exposure. They spent the majority of their time in the most basic attachment, the fully-instrumented portion of the instrument, before transitioning to the fully functional portion of the instrument. They only had a minimal portion of their time actually in the simulation stage. Overall, however, we did find an increased feeling of responsibility for various project components in these participants.
