

Plate Tectonics

Convergent Boundary

Plates will slide slowly towards each other. This plate movement creates surface features such as volcanoes, volcanic island arcs, mountains, and ocean trenches.

Divergent Boundary

Plates will float slowly away from each other. This plate movement results in surface features such as mid-ocean ridges and rift valleys.

Transform Boundary

Plates will slide past one another. This plate movement results in surface features such as fault zones and also associated with earthquakes.

Plate Motion

The tectonic plates that sit on Earth's asthenosphere, consist of large fragments of the Earth's lithosphere. The heat from the Earth's core causes the convection currents in the Mantle. The motion of the tectonic plates occurs as the magma rises and falls in the Mantle. This motion allows the plates to slowly move creating Earth's surface features.
