

Accountability and the Leader Army as Important Elements for Soldier Confidence

Accountability can be defined as taking action, decision making, and responsibility. When in a position of leadership, it is important to take accountability even if it's blameworthy. Leaders will take full responsibilities of those accounted for and those failure to be in place of duty. Being accountable when in a position of leadership can be vital in many aspects. Aspects of accountability that leaders need to possess can include promoting trust, saving time and finances, and ensuring confidence. Leaders who display accountability in the workplace fuel the success of their organization. Promoting trust is essential as a leader in the Army. Having accountability over a task or people ensures that the Soldier can devote to something and be responsible enough to carry it out to the end. When in that position the Soldier or individual earns trust with the people appointed over them. Mutual trust among the leader and Soldiers is more than a bond. "Currently within the Army, there is an understanding that trust is imperative for unit effectiveness and is a foundational element to mission command." (Holmberg, Salazar, Herd, Lane, & Orslene, 2019). Trust is about perception. Soldiers may trust a leader at work but when put in a different environment that leader may not be as competent. This impacts the Soldier's trust. The three C's (Competence, Caring, and Communication) of trust can help leaders build relations with Soldiers so there is no fear. This allows accountability to be combined in. Without fear Soldiers are more likely to account for their failures. Accountability is a responsible, trustworthy role. It ties into integrity with leaders taking responsibility for their actions in the case that they fail. Accountability saves time and money within the Army; Soldiers and leaders being liable and responsible for their actions can result in sufficient usage of time and money. Most
