Airplane Upset Training Evaluation Report, 2002 Airplane Upset Training Evaluation Report National Aeronautics Administration, 2014-12-16

In the last decades loss of control in flight was the largest category of commercial jet fatal accidents worldwide. Precipitating factors in these accidents have included equipment failures and system anomalies, weather phenomena, inappropriate use of flight controls or systems, inappropriate control responses by crew, or some combination of these factors. In many of these accidents, flight crews could have recovered from the initial upset attitude by promptly applying appropriate control inputs. However, recovery from upset attitudes is challenging, even for highly experienced airline pilots, for the following reasons:

1. pilots rarely have opportunities to practice the appropriate procedures, and
2. demanding time constraints, and in some cases altitude constraints.

Also, recovery from some upset accidents requires not only correctly manipulating the controls, but also recognizing the underlying problem causing the upset. The initial upset is generally sudden and unexpected; the crew must not only quickly and correctly assess the situation, but also implement recovery procedures appropriate to the situation. Usually, the crew does not have enough time for the relatively slow cognitive processes of reasoning and problem solving; rather, the appropriate actions must be highly learned, skilled responses that can be executed more quickly. The NTSB has on several occasions recommended that pilots be trained to recover proficiently from abnormal regimes of flight and unusual attitudes. Both the FAA and the ATA encourage airlines to conduct upset attitude recovery training, and many U.S. carriers now include some limited training of this sort, although the content and extent of the training varies widely. Typically, the training consists of a combination of classroom presentations and simulator training. In 1997-98, a consortium of airplane manufacturers, airlines, pilot associations, flight training organizations, and government agencies developed an airplane upset recovery training aid that included recommended procedures for excessive nose-high and nose-low attitudes. To date, no formal study of the effectiveness of existing airplane upset recovery training programs has been made. Many questions remain unanswered, for example:

- How extensively must pilots practice recovery maneuvers to obtain proficiency?
- How often must pilots train to maintain proficiency?
- To what extent does generic training enable pilots to recover from a wide range of potential upset attitude scenarios?
- To what extent can training address the factor of surprise that occurs in actual line upsets?
- To what extent will training in ground-based simulators transfer appropriately to actual flight, given that ground-based simulators cannot match the forces and accelerations encountered in actual upsets, and given that the fidelity of the aerodynamic models of the simulators is not well established or implemented outside of normal operating parameters?

Supported by a contract from the training element of NASA's Aviation Safety Training Program, Veridian Engineering recently completed a study that bears on some of these questions:

1. The primary objective of this study was to generate data to support decision making on the part of the FAA and the airlines. NASA's specific objectives in sponsoring the study were to compare the relative effectiveness of no training, aerobatic training in light aircraft ground simulation combined aerobatic and ground simulation training and in flight simulation training on airplane upset recovery 2 To determine how well currently trained new hire airline pilots are able to respond to a representative set of prototypical airplane upset scenarios 3 To identify any specific weakness in pilots recovery techniques and to identify areas in which current training should be improved and 4 To determine whether some types of airplane upset scenarios are more difficult to recover from than others

Airplane Upset Training Evaluation Report National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA),2018-06-27 Airplane upset accidents are a leading factor in hull losses and fatalities This study compared five types of airplane upset training Each group was composed of eight non military pilots flying in their probationary year for airlines operating in the United States The first group No aero no upset was made up of pilots without any airplane upset training or aerobatic flight experience the second group Aero no upset of pilots without any airplane upset training but with aerobatic experience the third group No aero upset of pilots who had received airplane upset training in both ground school and in the simulator the fourth group Aero upset received the same training as Group Three but in addition had aerobatic flight experience and the fifth group In flight received in flight airplane upset training using an instrumented in flight simulator Recovery performance indicated that clearly training works specifically all 40 pilots recovered from the windshear upset However few pilots were trained or understood the use of bank to change the direction of the lift vector to recover from nose high upsets Further very few thought of or used differential thrust to recover from rudder or aileron induced roll upsets In addition recovery from icing induced stalls was inadequate Gawron Valerie J and Jones Patricia M Technical Monitor Ames Research Center NAS2 99070 RTOP 728 20 30

The Limits of Expertise R. Key Dismukes,Benjamin A. Berman,Loukia Loukopoulos,2017-03-02 Why would highly skilled well trained pilots make errors that lead to accidents when they had safely completed many thousands of previous flights The majority of all aviation accidents are attributed primarily to human error but this is often misinterpreted as evidence of lack of skill vigilance or conscientiousness of the pilots The Limits of Expertise is a fresh look at the causes of pilot error and aviation accidents arguing that accidents can be understood only in the context of how the overall aviation system operates The authors analyzed in great depth the 19 major U S airline accidents from 1991 2000 in which the National Transportation Safety Board NTSB found crew error to be a causal factor Each accident is reviewed in a separate chapter that examines events and crew actions and explores the cognitive processes in play at each step The approach is guided by extensive evidence from cognitive psychology that human skill and error are opposite sides of the same coin The book examines the ways in which competing task demands ambiguity and organizational pressures interact with cognitive processes to make all experts vulnerable to characteristic forms of error The final chapter identifies themes cutting across the accidents discusses the role of chance criticizes simplistic concepts of causality of accidents and suggests ways to reduce vulnerability to these catastrophes The authors complementary experience allowed a unique approach to the study accident investigation with the NTSB cognitive psychology research both in the lab and in the field enormous first hand experience of piloting and application of aviation psychology in both civil and military operations This combination allowed the authors to examine and explain the domain specific aspects of aviation operations and to extend advances in basic research in cognition to complex issues of human performance in the real world Although The Limits of Expertise is directed to aviation operations the implications are clear for understanding the decision processes skilled performance and errors of professionals in many domains including medicine Handbook of Aviation Human Factors John A. Wise, V. David Hopkin, Daniel J. Garland, 2016-04-19 A complete examination of issues and concepts relating to human factors in simulation this book covers theory and application in space ships submarines naval aviation and commercial aviation The authors examine issues of simulation and their effect on the validity and functionality of simulators as a training device The chapters contain in d

Safety Causation Analysis in Sociotechnical Systems: Advanced Models and Techniques Esmaeil Zarei, 2024-07-22 This book provides a comprehensive view on theories models and techniques used to investigate and analyze incidents and safety causalities occurring in sociotechnical systems Consisted of intricately interconnected components sociotechnical systems are always prone to incidents These incidents can ensue with adverse effects on employees and the public the environment and company s properties and reputation Sometimes a single incident has the potential to terminate the operation of a business forever As incidents are multi factorial and not easy to comprehend they should be investigated systematically in a structured way so as to find their root causes and prevent them from recurring Consequently there have been developed many theories models and techniques aimed at accomplishing this goal However each approach has its own upsides and downsides and there is no universal one applicable to all cases Therefore researchers and practitioners may sometimes find it difficult to select the most appropriate approach for the given case After introducing theories models and techniques pertaining to incident investigation and safety causalities modeling this book explains each one in details and discusses their pros and cons The book aims to provide the audience with a step by step guidance for performing incident investigation and analysis At the end of each chapter an example is analyzed by the introduced tool Finally the book offers criteria based on which an incident analysis technique can be selected Aircraft Accident Report ,
