There is a common, almost universal, belief that the "feminine" is inferior to the "masculine." This belief is a product of a male-dominated society that has created a hierarchy of values in which the male is considered superior to the female. This hierarchy is based on a number of factors, including physical strength, intellectual ability, and social status. The male is often seen as the provider and protector, while the female is seen as the nurturer and caregiver. This division of labor has led to a devaluation of the female's role in society, and a corresponding devaluation of the female's intellect and abilities. This belief is not only harmful to women, but it is also harmful to men, as it limits their ability to express their emotions and connect with others on a deeper level. It is time to challenge this belief and recognize the value of the female in all aspects of life.

From a developmental perspective, it is important to note that the majority of the research on the effects of the environment on the development of the brain is based on studies of children and adolescents. This is because the brain is most plastic during this period of life, and the effects of the environment are most pronounced. However, there is also evidence that the environment can affect the brain in adults, and this is an area that needs further research.

1. There is a positive relationship between perceived effectiveness and the number of years in the system. For example, among teachers, perceived effectiveness was 40% higher for those with 20 or more years of experience than for those with 1-5 years of experience. (This relationship was not statistically significant for principals.)
