

Lab # 12&13: Acid Rain

Introduction: New York State along with some other states in the northeast is suing several states from the Midwest in the United States Supreme Court. New York State is claiming that when the wind blows from the West air pollution from factories in the Midwestern states is causing acid rain to fall in New York State. This acid rain is harming crops, killing trees in the forests, destroying habitats in rivers and streams, and causing erosion of buildings and other structures.

The justices of the Supreme Court have hired you as A Biologist and an Environmentalist to test samples of rain from New York State and to evaluate the claims being made by the State. The justices require that this report meet certain specifications that will be described below.

Part 1 – The Supreme Court requires that you use two indicators to test the rain samples since it is important that all results are confirmed. One type of indicator that the court wants used is litmus paper (both Red and Blue). The second indicator is pH paper, which turns various colors upon contact with a substances' specific pH. They further require that there be a written explanation of how red and blue Litmus papers are used to decide if the rainwater is an acid, a base, or neutral.

Step 1- Using the red and blue litmus paper and the known samples of acid, base, and distilled (pure) water, establish a procedure that can be used to decide if a substance is acidic, basic or neutral. (Hint: litmus paper is an indicator that turns color depending upon the environment it is in.) Make sure to record all your results in the data table below.

Substance Tested	INDICATORS
