

The human skeleton is composed of 206 bones, which are divided into the axial skeleton (skull and spine) and the appendicular skeleton (arms and legs). The bones are made of a hard, mineralized tissue called bone, which is constantly being renewed and repaired. The process of bone formation is called ossification, and it involves the deposition of calcium and other minerals into a matrix of collagen fibers. The bones are connected to each other by joints, which allow for movement. The joints are classified into three types: fibrous joints, cartilaginous joints, and synovial joints. The synovial joints are the most common and allow for the greatest range of motion. They are characterized by the presence of a synovial cavity, which is filled with a lubricating fluid called synovial fluid. The bones are also connected to muscles, which provide the force for movement. The muscles are made of muscle tissue, which is composed of long, cylindrical cells called muscle fibers. The muscle fibers are connected to each other by gap junctions, which allow for the transmission of electrical signals. The electrical signals are called action potentials, and they are generated by the nervous system. The action potentials travel along the surface of the muscle fibers, causing them to contract. The contraction of the muscle fibers is the result of the interaction between actin and myosin filaments. Actin is a protein that forms thin filaments, and myosin is a protein that forms thick filaments. The myosin filaments have heads that can attach to the actin filaments and pull them towards the center of the myosin filament. This causes the actin filaments to slide past each other, which results in the contraction of the muscle fiber.
