

AC MOTOR & AC MOTOR PROTECTION GUIDE

Part-1 of 2

(Javed Ahmed)

INTRODUCTION

Intent of this guide is to cover aspects of large capacity AC Motors with the intention of assisting Electrical Engineers who are in the business of dealing with Control & Protection of AC Motors in Industry & Utilities. However, most of AC Motors are covered to some extent.

Simplest and most widely Motor in the World is Squirrel cage Induction Motor. This is because it is most robust and can be highly efficient and less complex in its design and simplest means required for its control. Motors find their application in many areas like locomotion, fans, pumps, control systems, tiny electronic circuitry of wrist watches just to mention a fraction of many.

Therefore, only two types of Motors are considered here. They are Induction Motors & Synchronous Motors.

Induction Motors:

These Motors are supplied with AC power supply only to its Stator Winding. Stator current produces a flux in the Rotor crossing over the air-gap between the Stator & Rotor. Necessary additional flux required in the Rotor to produce a rotation is obtained by induction principle. Thus energy is transferred from Stator alone to the Motor which results in rotation of the Rotor producing mechanical energy. These Motors are called poly phase or single phase type based on supply voltage to the Stator.

Rotors, however, can be either poly phase type (wound rotor) or bar type bare un-insulated conductors (squirrel cage rotor). In case of Wound rotor Motors, each phase is insulated from the Rotor body and its end is brought out through slip rings for connection to starting control which is stationary system. In case of Squirrel cage rotor, bare conductors are located in slots around the periphery almost parallel to the Rotor linear axis and are shorted at both ends by means compatible metallic ring forming like what looks like a traditional Squirrel cage.

Synchronous Motors:

These Motors are poly phase with Stator winding almost identical to that of an Induction Motor and is connected to the AC supply source. However, its rotor is also connected to separate supply source, which is a DC source. This DC supply is provided to the Rotor Poles (usually salient poles) which are matching with stator phase winding poles. This DC supply to the Rotor is called field excitation. There are many ways of supplying the Field excitation to the Rotor with or without brush & slip rings. For starting a Synchronous Motor, a number of bar conductors are embedded in the Rotor pole faces. These bars get induced voltages from Stator current and thus Motor rotates on same principle as an Induction Motor. DC
