Drezner,2007 Managers of weapon system acquisition programs and their staffs have often voiced concerns about the burden of complying with federal statutes or regulations requiring certain business and oversight processes The essence of the concerns is that program offices spend an inordinate amount of time complying with statutes and regulations that add little value and that the regulatory burden translates into cost increases schedule delays and adverse effects on system performance While many other studies have addressed this topic few have succeeded in generating the empirical evidence needed to inform the policy debate To fill this gap NDRI developed a Web based data collection tool to capture the program staff s estimates of hours spent on compliance efforts A total of 316 individuals in seven DoD program offices were recruited to use the web tool to estimate biweekly the time they spent on regulatory compliance related activities over the course of a year While statutes and regulations do place constraints on program execution the study found that program office staffs do not appear to spend a significant amount of their time complying with those statutes and regulations Further there is little evidence that program office compliance activities have adverse consequences for program outcomes      Social Security Handbook ,1969      Social Security Handbook on Retirement Insurance, Survivors Insurance, Disability Insurance, Health Insurance for the Aged ,1969      United States Government Organization Manual ,2005
