of composite materials and the development of various surface treatment methods have led to the establishment of an interface art. A trial and error approach has dominated the interfacial aspects of composite technology until very recently. With the advent of modern analytical techniques for surface characterization it became possible to study detailed surface and interface structures. It was hoped that this symposium would catalyze such a fundamental and scientific approach in composite studies. For this reason the symposium was structured to verify the influence of interfacial structures on the mechanical and physical performance of composites and to improve our knowledge of the microstructure of composite interfaces. As the word composite indicates interdisciplinary interaction is indispensable for proper understanding of multiphase systems.
