

The main characteristic of separation anxiety is when a child becomes upset when parted from a parent or carer. It is a specific phobia and a type of anxiety. Separation anxiety is considered normal in early childhood and in most cases eases, as the child reaches school age.

If this anxiety is recurrent and causes a lot of distress for the child, it may be possible that the child has separation anxiety disorder.

Separation anxiety disorder may be present when:

- the anxiety is impacting on the child's ability to live their life,
- the anxiety has persisted for more than four weeks,
- the level of anxiety is extremely high and causing the child ongoing distress.

Separation anxiety disorder can also result in a child experiencing a panic attack when separated or are thinking about being separated from a caregiver.

Other signs of social anxiety disorder may be:

- refusing to attend school or other social events where they need to be separated from their parent or carer,
- expressing that they feel sick when they have been separated from their parent or carer,
- worrying that something might happen to their parent or carer when they are not with them.

It is important to involve a professional diagnosis before labelling a child with anxiety related to a specific phobia.

It is important to have clear communication of how the child's presentation is related to their needs, such as a caregiver knowing how off or what support is best for their child without judgement. The child is displaying symptoms of social anxiety disorder when it is not a temporary response to a specific situation or a response to a specific event. There are no clear cut-off points to when the child is displaying symptoms.
