

POSTERIOR INTEROSSEOUS NERVE SYNDROME

Cardinal features

- Inability to extend fingers at metacarpophalangeal joints
- No wrist drop (but radial deviation on wrist extension due to involvement of extensor carpi ulnaris and sparing of extensor carpi radialis)
- Sensation normal

The posterior interosseous nerve is a motor branch of the radial nerve that arises in the posterior forearm. It supplies motor innervation to the majority of muscles in the posterior compartment of the forearm.

Source :Anatomic Basis of Neurologic Diagnosis,2nd Edition,Thiem

As the PIN passes under the arcade of Frohse, a fibrous arch at origin of the supinator muscle, the nerve may be pathologically constricted. The cardinal features of this syndrome are an inability to extend the fingers at MCP joint, absence of wrist drop, and normal sensation.

Although no wrist drop is present because the extensor carpi radialis is preserved, the extensor carpi ulnaris is a PIN-innervated muscle, and thus any attempt to extend the wrist results in a radial deviation of the hand. Because the PIN is a pure motor nerve, sensation in this syndrome is entirely normal.

Preparation & presentation by: @OBandarchi

Because the finger extensors at the interphalangeal joint are Median & Ulnar innervated, the patient is able to extend the fingers at this joint. Branches to the supinator muscle are given off proximal to the nerve entering the arcade of Frohse, causing the supinator muscle to be spare.
