

Rewriting the American Nation

Scholars have long been interested in attempts by American historical writers of the eighteenth century to create new forms of national identity, especially in the wake of the Revolutionary War when history played an important role in consolidating the self-confidence of the fragile new nation.¹ What has been much less well understood is the extent to which the demands of nation-building penetrated individual encounters between American readers and the books they read, both before and after the Declaration of Independence in 1776. Importantly for the purposes of this book, British histories circulated in huge numbers in the private homes of American families, such that a proposed American edition of Hume's History of England failed in 1771 not (as tradition would have it) because the work was unpopular, but because the colonial market was already 'saturated' with affordable imported editions of the same work.² The same is true for the social libraries, educational collections and commercial lending facilities that by the time of the Revolution could be found in almost every major urban centre, with histories by Hume, Gibbon, Robertson and many other British writers reaching large numbers of American readers, and remaining exceptionally popular well after independence.³ Not only were American readers therefore deriving much of their historical information from the same sources as readers in other parts of the Anglophone world, they were also engaged in the same culture of history reading, as we saw in Chapter 1 – growing up with the same advice about how history should be read, and drawing on the same note-taking conventions.
