

BIG SAGEBRUSH, A. tridentata (fig. 273), is a rigid, much-branched shrub, quite variable in height (see key). Leaves bluish-silvery, wedge-shaped, 3-toothed at apex, strongly aromatic; heads numerous, in narrow panicles. Sagebrush usually grows in colonies, often covering many acres or square miles on dry, open valleys, foothills, and lower montane slopes, especially where there is deep but dry soil.

ALPINE OR ROCKY MOUNTAIN SAGE, A. scopulorum, is a small, silvery plant with few or several tufted stems 10–25cm tall; leaves mostly basal, divided into narrow segments. Occurs from Montana to New Mexico and Utah. ALPINE MOUNTAIN SAGE, A. pattersonii (fig. 274), found in Colorado and New Mexico, is similar but somewhat shorter. Both occur on rocky or grassy alpine slopes. BOREAL MOUNTAIN SAGE, A. arctica ssp. saxicola, is another alpine species, occurring from Alaska south along the western mountains to Colorado and California. Clustered, reddish stems 10–30cm tall; nodding heads with dark-margined phyllaries.

FRINGED OR PASTURE MOUNTAIN SAGE, A. frigida (fig. 275), is an attractive plant with finely-divided, silvery leaves in basal tufts and slender clusters of small, nodding, yellowish flower heads. Commonly seen on dry slopes of the foothill, montane, and subalpine zones throughout the Rockies. The early settlers used this aromatic plant to make a bitter tea, which was believed to be a tonic and a remedy for mountain (typhoid) fever. Establishes itself on the disturbed soil of roadsides and on overgrazed pasture land.
