

All Summer in a Day

Ray Bradbury

"Ready"

"Ready"

"Now!"

"Zoom."

"Do the scientists really know? Will it happen today, will it?"

"Look, look, see the planes?"

The children pressed to each other like so many roses, so many weeds, intoxicated, peering out for a look at the hidden sun.

It rained.

It had been raining for seven years, thousands upon thousands of days compounded and filled from one end to the other with rain, with the drums and gush of water, with the sweet crystal fall of showers and the concussion of storms so heavy the y were tidal waves come over the islands. A thousand forests had been crushed under the rain and grown up a thousand times to be crushed again. And this was the way life was forever on the planet Venus, and this was the schoolrooms of the children of the soot-bet men and women who had come to a raining world to set up civilizations and live out their lives.

"It's stopping, it's stopping!"

"Yes, yes!"

Maupet stood apart from them, from these children who could never remember a time when the sun wasn't rain and rain and rain. The y were all nine years old, and if there had been a day, seven years ago, when the sun came out for an hour and showed its face to the stunned world, they could not recall. Some times, at night, she heard them stir in remembrance, and she knew they were dreaming and remembering gold or a yellow capon or a coin large enough to buy the world with. She knew they thought they remembered a whisper, like a blowing in the face, in the body, in the arms and legs and trembling hands. But then they always awoke to the tinging drums, the endless shaking down of clear bead necklaces upon the roof, the walk, the gardens, the forests, and their dreams were gone.
