Shoglen, S. (1994)

Have you ever wondered what the attitude of a community toward immigrants predicts the approval ratings of their representatives? Consider some of the public attitudes identified in a community where ethnic heterogeneity is high and how these characteristics have affected the political process and what effects these attitudes actually have on the politicians elected to office?

What are the characteristics of a community that predict the degree of the "Shoglen effect" where voters elect leaders in a district where immigrants, ethnic minorities, and/or immigrants are the most likely to be elected to the central office or position? Does immigration have a higher frequency of political activity for immigrants and/or ethnic minorities in the community than in the district? The author and his colleagues are interested in the effects of the community's characteristics on the results of the election and on the results of the community's characteristics on the results of the election. The author is interested in the effects of the community's characteristics on the results of the election and on the results of the community's characteristics on the results of the election.
