

Study 1

Observations suggest that individuals report a homogeneous belief in the existence of supernatural forces or spirits. Despite this, existing literature showed the difficulty of this belief and the lack of evidence for its existence. The current study tested the hypothesis that individuals who are highly religious are more likely to believe in the existence of supernatural forces or spirits.

Study 2

In this study, we tested the hypothesis that the degree of religious belief is related to the degree of belief in the existence of supernatural forces or spirits. We used a sample of individuals who were highly religious and measured their belief in the existence of supernatural forces or spirits. We found that individuals who were highly religious were more likely to believe in the existence of supernatural forces or spirits.

Study 3

For Study 3

We tested the hypothesis that the degree of religious belief is related to the degree of belief in the existence of supernatural forces or spirits.

We used a sample of individuals who were highly religious and measured their belief in the existence of supernatural forces or spirits.
