Plant Reference Chart

REDMAN

WATERMILFORE

(Elodea canadensis)
An aggressive plant, the water milfoil can grow 2' tall (or more) length forming dense mats at the water's surface. Growing in thick, sand, or silt, this becomes a nuisance plant in many lakes and ponds by quickly outcompeting native species. Identifying features include a pattern of leaves whorled around a hollow stem. Feathery in appearance, each leaf consists of 10-12 pairs of finely pointed leaflets. Out of the water the leaves become limp, compressing against the stem. Hybridization with native milfoil species is common.

WATERMILFORE

(Elodea canadensis)
The native species of milfoil has a hollow stem with whorled leaves at intervals along the entire length of the plant. Leaves are finely divided to the mid-vein and feathery in appearance. Each feathery leaf consists of 10-12 pairs of leaflets, which is less than that found in our native European Watermilfoil. The native plant is submerged with the exception of a tiny stalk of flowers that may extend above the water surface. The plant can easily be confused with an hybrid with invasive European Watermilfoil.

FAIRBURY

(Elodea canadensis)

The submerged water species is not common but management look an hybrid. Very similar to aquatic species. Leaves are divided into five branches in a fan-like appearance, opposite structure, opening 1 entire. Floating leaves are small, diamond shape with an emergent white, pinkish flower. Dense stands can occur forming mats at the water surface. This species is native to parts of the Southeast United States.

EIGHTY-AGE

(Elodea canadensis)

Supporting waterfowl, fish, and insects. Coastal can be a desirable aquatic plant. However, thick growths around shore can be problematic. Lacking true roots, it commonly floats near the surface later in summer. Soft leaves are whorled around a hollow stem in groups of five to twelve. Coastal can be differentiated from milfoil by forked, not feathery leaves. Leaf opening is highly variable, but the ends are often toothy, like a raccoon tail.

(Utricularia spp.)

This plant is free floating and does not utilize a standard root system having yellow or purple strap dragon like flowers which emerge just above the water's surface. There are finely divided leaves clustered along the stem with many small structures that look like bladders attached to the leaves. These bladders act as traps to capture small aquatic invertebrates.

SLENDER NARAI

(Potamogeton)

Leaves of the Slender Naiad may occur in pseudo whorls or repeatedly positioned pairs (whorls tend to occur at the end of the stems). The short and narrow leaves are submerged with variable spacing between nodes. The edges may or may not appear spiny and the leaf tips taper to a fine point. Naiads are annual plants, growing from seed each year, and can form dense, bushy masses by rhizomes.

NORTHERN NARAI

(Potamogeton amplifolius)

Clearly resembling Slender Naiads, Northern Naiads tend to be slightly wider and more robust than slender naiad with reddish brown stems. Leaves appear spiny along the margins. Sheaths at the base leaves surround the stem and may conceal seeds.

WILD CELERY

(Valisneria spiralis)

Also known commonly as Sagittaria or Tapegrass, this submerged plant can form thick beds and dominates an area. The ribbon like leaves are all attached at the base of the plant, and have a distinctive "crisp" down the center of the leaf. Individual plants are often attached to each other along creeping underground rhizomes. Flower when out of the water, the foliage occurs in tufts, much like turf grass. Soft mud bottoms are its preferred substrate.

PONDWEED

(Potamogeton crispus)

This undesirable weed, also known as Crisp Pondweed, bears a waxy coating on its upper leaves making them stiff and somewhat brittle. The leaves have been described as resembling tongue needles, but upon close inspection a row of "teeth" can be seen to line the margins. Growing in dense mats near the water's surface, it outcompetes native plants for sun and space very early in spring. By rhizomes, floating natural die-offs can dramatically lower oxygen levels increasing fish kills.

(Potamogeton amplifolius)

Appearing extremely leafy at the tip due to frequent branching, Clasp leaf can be easily confused with curly leaf pondweed. Both bear waxy, submerged leaves, however curly leaf pondweed's leaves are oriented along the edges. Clasp leaf has leaves with smooth edges and a wide base that wraps around the stem almost completely.

(Potamogeton amplifolius)

Thick, large stems and broad football shaped leaves aid in identification of Large leaf pondweed. The submerged leaves appear waxy and taper toward the stem. Floating leaves are egg shaped. Rarely is this pondweed found branching.

(Potamogeton nodosus)

Floating leaves are lance like, oval in shape with the tips slightly pointed. The base tapers to a very long, distinct petiole. The submerged leaves of this plant are often lance-like, and also taper to a long petiole. This plant generally has sparse leafing that is arranged alternately.
